Language Competencies:

Reading knowledge of French and Spanish.
Comprehensive knowledge of Marshallese.
Micro-computer literacy.

Academic Specialization:

My theoretical interests are quite diverse, with past study in sociology and psychology as well as in anthropology. I have also pursued work on the history of anthropological theory, phenomenology, semiotics, and structuralist and post-structuralist theory. My anthropological writings are invested in a meaning-based approach that explores the relationship between identity and personal and group empowerment. This approach has led me to concentrate on the historically shifting and constantly emergent relationships between ideology and social practice. Of necessity, the same approach has led me to focus on in-depth analyses of small scale social situations with a stress on the quality of ethnographic detail. In addition to courses offered at Montana State University, Wesleyan, and the University of South Carolina, my areas of teaching expertise include: theories of exchange, non-verbal interaction, and symbolic anthropology (culture theory, social interactionism, structuralism, and post-structural approaches).

Oceania is my area of ethnographic specialization, with past research in Micronesia and Polynesia. Active involvement in the Association for Social Anthropology in Oceania has helped me remain aware of recent work throughout the Pacific Region. At present, I am one of the only established anthropological scholars with active research interests in the Marshall Islands. While I have worked extensively with the Ujelang/Enewetak community, my recent research has dealt with comparative ethnohistoric investigations of the Ralik and Ratak Chains. I have also begun to research the ways in which Marshall Islanders create and maintain identities in Hawaii and in northwest Arkansas. These expanded ethnographic materials will give social scientists and historians a better idea of the multifarious character of Marshallese social life, of its contextual variety and historically-shifting forms.
